Researchers can be faced with ethical dilemmas concerning their research work or research topics, their responsibilities, the impact of their research on society, the way of conducting and publishing their research, and other aspects. Studying cultural heritage objects especially requires a global perspective that is sensitive towards different research contexts and attitudes in societies across the world. CSMC's guidelines for Ethical and Responsible Research provides colleagues with an overview of basic rules of conduct regarding various stakeholders, the artefacts we work with, and the research data we generate and use.

With this short lecture series, we want to discuss considerations behind these ethical guidelines and examples from real life research with a wide range of scholars and students of UHH. The short lectures of 45 minutes (all starting sin tempo) are given by different members of CSMC. They will be held in hybrid format and are open to everyone interested in the topics.
